INTRODUCTORY NOTES

THE present exhibition, which tries to illustrate in a representative array the development of portrait engraving from the beginning to the end of the XVIIth Century, has been made possible through the circumstance of my now having in hand a most remarkable private collection of about 200 examples of the works of that period. The owner has kindly permitted the selection of whatever might be considered most illustrative and of very special interest, and accordingly, 35 items have been chosen. These, together with 40 from my own collections, represent, however, only about one-fourth of the portraits of this period now here available for display.

Naturally, such a selection is dominated by Nanteuil, who is represented by 34 pieces, marking the climax of that art in his country. The French and most important branch of the exhibition has been arranged so as to show especially characteristic work of the teachers and precursors of this central figure, as well as of his pupils and followers. The development of Nanteuil himself reveals the early influence of the works of Mellan and Morin, before the master had formed his own characteristic style, which he in turn communicated to various pupils and followers. Of the earlier French masters there are (besides Mellan and Morin) rare and interesting works by Vouillemont, Daret, Lombart, Regnesson, etc. Of Nanteuil's contemporaries and pupils, Masson and Edelinck rank foremost, and we find, likewise, portraits by Van Schuppen, Simon, Pitau and Pierre Drevet.

* The last two examples of the French group, the prints by Chereau and Pierre Imbert Drevet, do not actually belong to the XVIIth Century, but these two works of the early XVIIIth Century (both "Reception Works" for the Academy) are included, as they illustrate most interestingly the transition to a new artistic period. The technical qualities still betray the brilliancy of the old style, while the arrangement and effect show the strong influence of that new taste which has discarded classical simplicity for a more pompous decorative effect.

The development of portraiture in Holland is illustrated by only a dozen engravings. We start with the father of the school, Goltzius, the magician of technique. Then we find the Delffs, who likewise betray a strong influence of the XVIth Century work of the Wierix brothers. In Suyderhoef we find the master of the "manière mixte" and the wonderful interpreter of Frans Hals; and then we arrive at the Dutch genius of portrait-engraving—Cornelis Visscher. Visscher died young (some maintain at the age of thirty, other authorities grant him ten years more). Had he lived longer and produced a larger number of works, I think there would be little doubt that he would be generally recognized as greater than Nanteuil. And indeed important authorities consider the Dutch engraver far superior to the French Master, his work representing the highest perfection in the art of portrait engraving.

We have further specimens of the work of two clever followers of Visscher—Cornelis van Dalen and Abraham Blootelingh; while Pieter van Gunst shows interestingly how the taste of the XVIIIth Century took hold in Holland.

German art of the XVIIth Century suffered badly under the influence of the Thirty Years War. We find only in the Killian family and in Jeremias Falck engravers worthy of note. These artists are represented by characteristic and brilliant examples. Indeed, the fact should be emphasized that all the engravings in this Exhibition are of perfect quality of preservation and of almost uniform brilliancy of impression.

RICHARD EDERHEIMER.

NOTE: All items marked with an asterisk belong to the above mentioned Collection and cannot be sold individually. The other engravings belonging to this Collection will be on view in portfolios.
